Considering the school as a workplace for both teachers and students leads to new approaches to the design of computer instructional systems. To support a project-based approach to teaching and learning, in which the students' role is similar to an apprentice, computer network systems must provide for students gradually assuming greater responsibility.

Over time, all of the topics covered in "normal" schooling get covered, but they happen in a much different order and at the child's own pace. At the other end of the spectrum, there are families who buy all of the books and follow the state curriculum just like a normal school would. The material is simply taught at home in a smaller setting.

~~Homeschool . . .~~

Yes, I believe that school really does prepare students for life after school, which is usually work. Being in the working environment requires familiarity with certain subjects and, of course, working in teams and being around people. School prepares people for this from group projects, exams and participating in extracurricular activities.
